Interview with Beatrix von Rantzau

Our alumna Beatrix von Rantzau studied Economics and Social Sciences at WiSo. Since graduating in 2014, she has held various positions at pme Familienservice GmbH. In 2022 she started a part-time training as a trainer at the INeKO Institute of the University of Cologne and has since then conducted moderations, impulse lectures and team workshops for pme. In our alumni interview, she tells us how her studies sharpened her eye for potential, what role mindfulness plays for teamwork and what she sees as indispensable factors for successful reconciliation.

"What I took with me from economics into the working world is the perspective of paying attention to inefficiencies and doing something about them if possible. I try to keep that in mind, even if it means encountering resistance in the corporate world."

Beatrix von Rantzau

Dear Beatrix, you graduated from WiSo with a degree in economics and social sciences. Today, you work at pme Familienservice GmbH, an agency that supports employees of companies in a variety of ways to successfully balance work and private life. What interests you about it?

I'm interested in the topic of reconciliation because, as an economist, I'm looking for ways to make the best possible use of existing resources and potential. And when it comes to balancing work and private life, there is a lot of untapped potential. Starting a family for example: In Germany, we have a large potential of well-educated women who reduce their working hours when they have children and who then remain in (low) part-time employment, in some cases involuntarily, and find no way to pick up where they left off in their careers before starting a family. This is inefficient. It does not contribute to personal satisfaction. This is also true for fathers, who might like to take a more active family role but instead follow the existing incentives of the system. It also manifests the gender pay gap and later the gender pension gap. In my view, reconciliation and the distribution of care work in a partnership are the basic prerequisites for equality.
